Symposium: Community Resilience – The Mental Health Legacy of Conflict

Armed conflict profoundly disrupts societies and the processes by which these conflicts are resolved usually involves complex political compromises. The consequence of this is that, while armed conflict may be resolved, societies are left with difficult legacy issues that often take generations to work through. The Mental Health impact is one such complex legacy issue.

This symposium is arranged to provide an opportunity to explore the breadth and depth of the psychological impact of conflict on society. Using examples of work in Northern Ireland and Croatia, we will explore the social impact of conflict under 3 headings:

- The direct traumatic impact of those who have survived personal violence.
- The impact of national conflict on those who use Mental Health Services.
- The psychological impact of conflict on whole populations.

9:00 - 11:00  Plenary session with speakers from post conflict areas.
              From Northern Ireland: Prof Siobhan O'Neill
